CONTENTS

Volume III. No. 4

January, 1912

"The Morning Walk." By Gainsborough . . . .	98
---	----

A Lady of the Twelfth Dynasty . . . . .	99
---	----

While excavating in a cemetery near the pyramid of Amenemhat I., about thirty-five miles south of Cairo, an expedition organized by the Metropolitan Museum of Art, discovered in one of the tombs, the almost untouched burial of Senbtet, an Egyptian lady of the Twelfth Dynasty. Her mummy, her ornaments, her jewels, even her heart—the heart of a woman who lived nearly four thousand years ago—were found. The remains form part of the exhibition of Egyptian antiquities opened earlier in the season in the Museum.

Exhibition of the National Academy of Design . . .	109

Some favorable, but more caustic comment on an exhibition to which the writer points as explaining why the great American collectors do not patronize American art.

An Italian Critic on Anglo-Saxon Art . . . . .	114
--	-----

Printed, because commendatory, as a supplement to the previous article and as approaching the subject of American art from a different and more favorable point of view.

An American Artist Whose Canvas is the Stage . .	116
--	-----

Some reflections on the basis of artistic stage production, with special reference to two of the season's plays and their producer.

Gainsborough's Masterpiece; "The Morning Walk" . .	121
--	-----

Notes to accompany the first of a series of prints of Masterpieces in Art to appear, as occasion offers, in The Lotus Magazine. (See illustration, p. 98.)
